Additionally, how is the Scottish prosecution system structured? 2.In cases where the prosecutor either supplements the investigation themselves or requests further investigation from the police, are there specific manuals, guidelines, or laws that prosecutors refer to? 3.Are there materials used to train new prosecutors, particularly in relation to the procedures mentioned in question 2? 4.In cases where prosecutors supplement an investigation without requesting further investigation from the police, what types of cases typically involve this direct investigative role? For example, I've seen that prosecutors may handle investigations in cases involving police misconduct or suspicious deaths—do police still play any role in such cases? 5.Are Precognition Officers responsible for assisting prosecutors with their investigative work? 6.How are the working spaces organized between prosecutors and Precognition Officers? Do they work in the same office, or separately? If separately, how many individuals typically share a workspace, and what are their roles? 7.If prosecutors and Precognition Officers work in separate offices, are Precognition Officers assigned to specific prosecutors, or do they handle certain types of cases and collaborate with multiple prosecutors? Could you provide a specific example? 8.When a prosecutor decides to conduct further investigation or requests additional investigation from the police, what role does the Precognition Officer play? For example, do they review the case files and provide feedback to the prosecutor, or do they simply carry out specific tasks as instructed? 9.How do prosecutors and Precognition Officers typically communicate when dealing with cases forwarded from the police (e.g., orally, in writing, via email), and are there specific formats or templates used? 	11 Sept 2024	Part Provided
